Utah’s data on homeless riddled with problems

By the ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALT LAKE CITY — A study that aimed to paint the homeless population in Utah as a problem that doesn’t help explain the otherwise encouraging decline in the number of those living in stable, close-knit goals.

The audit released last week was designed to help state lawmakers decide which programs deserve funding, but it instead concluded better planning and realistic setting are needed before any measurements can be made.

The report also found that a 2011 declaration by state and local elected officials of the goal of eradicating chronic homelessness by 2015 was unrealistic and based on bad data.
